

James Franco Creates College Class About His Career

The Hollywood Reporter

a Nielsen Business Media publication THR.com

The Oscar-nominated actor has joined forces with Columbia College Hollywood for the course.

You can now study James Franco for college credit.

The Oscar-nominated actor has teamed up with Columbia College Hollywood — based in Tarzana, Calif. -- to offer a 12-student editing class where they will create a half-hour documentary using footage from his film career.

The course, called “Master Class: Editing James Franco ... With James Franco,” will be taught by Franco’s editor Tyler Danna, according to Movieline.

The actor, who will co-host the Academy Awards on Feb. 27 with Anne Hathaway, will talk to students through Skype and attend weekly sessions, depending on his schedule.

Franco is a Ph.D student in English at Yale. He received a MFA from Columbia last year.

Fletch Reboot Heading to the Big Screen

Warner Bros. has bought the rights to the Gregory McDonald book series previously adapted into two movies that starred Chevy Chase.

‘Toy Story 3’ Writer to Take on Disney’s Snow White Project (Exclusive)

Michael Arndt will work on “Snow and the Seven,” an East-meets-West take on the fairy tale set in 19th century China that’s being directed by Francis Lawr...

Golden Globes: No Truth to Ricky Gervais Return as Host in 2012 (EXCLUSIVE)

“We have not asked him to come back,” says Phil Berk in a statement. “Nice try, Ricky.”